The course is offered to young people who are passionate about business and personal development but do not have access to tertiary education. It aims to empower young people on their journey while developing their business and life skills. Mr Ackerman, together with the UCT Graduate School of Business, established the Academy in January 2005 with the desire to offer the youth with socio-economic challenges a chance to develop themselves and to make a difference in not only their own future but also in the future of their communities. The Academy offers a six-month full-time programme that runs twice a year: from January to June and from July to December. The programme is offered in Cape Town at the UCT Graduate School of Business. Business idea development is an important component of the programme. Students are taught techniques that allow them to develop or identify innovative business ideas that are not copycat ideas but rather ideas that appeal to the mass market and in many cases are solutions to common problems experienced in their communities. The Academy believes that teaching fundamental business skills is very important. As such the curriculum includes various personal development workshops that build confidence, professionalism and interpersonal skills. The classes are kept relatively small so that each student enjoys individual attention and is observed closely. This allows the Academy to monitor personal and academic progress and to intervene where necessary, assisting students to overcome the challenges that may be hampering their success whilst on the programme.  1.1 After reading the extract you felt that you needed to share the information with your fellow classmates. Mind map FIVE points from the second paragraph on why they also need to study at the Academy. QUESTION 4: READING COMPREHENSION

Read the following passage and answer the questions.

- Building an effective brand will go a long way towards helping your business stand out from that of your competitors when you are competing for attention from your potential customers. Just as each company has a brand, the space it occupies in the minds of its customers, competitors and employees, so too your business team also has a brand. The best team brands are those that are recognised by customers, peers and even the competitors for the value that they add in the workplace. Team branding is beneficial to both individuals who recognise that the next step in building their personal brand is to ensure that they collaborate to build a strong team brand, as well as to have organisational leaders who recognise that whilst teams need some autonomy to function at a high level they will benefit from building team brands that are distinctive yet aligned to the organisations to which they belong. Team brands share certain attributes that you should try to encourage in your business.
- The team understands its strengths and its positioning.

Successful team brands do not only understand the competitive landscape in which they operate, they also know what sets them apart from their competitors and how to use these strengths. Each member of the team understands the role he/she plays and how that role contributes to the value of the whole team.
- The team comprises individuals who are strong brand ambassadors.

Successful teams recognise that each person is an ambassador for the company. Together the team ensures that each member has the training and education necessary to represent the brand effectively. Every team member plays a vital role and there is no room in a successful team for someone who doesn't contribute towards achieving the team's goals. Well-branded teams are made up of strong personal brands but, however performance-driven they may be, individuals with team potential don't market themselves to stand out at the expense of the team brands. There is almost an anti-hero phenomenon at play.

4.	The team understands that visibility is just as important as ability.
	The team focuses both on doing its job brilliantly and marketing what it is doing . Team members understand that they constantly need to demonstrate the value of their clients in order to build credibility and cement their brand positioning.
5.	The team delivers value and has a clear idea of how it is done .
	Great team brands grasp that they not only need to deliver a product/service that works, but they must also be able to demonstrate return on investment to their client and then top that with even more value by making customers feel special at every touch point. They don't use a one-size-fits-all approach, but they focus on understanding their clients' needs and market to them as individuals to ensure they are relevant to each client.
6.	The team gets results.
	Effective team branding results in recognition from customers and peers. With recognition comes feedback and insight, which assist in making your team even more streamlined and efficient. Recognition turns the spotlight onto the team and the individuals in it. People develop pride in what they are doing, which in turn increases productivity, quality of work and morale. The team becomes more relevant and can therefore command and becomes sought after. It becomes more relevant and can therefore command an increased share of budget and management attention. Great teams are also proactive. They work to ensure they're strategically relevant to their customer's success. To create a team brand, the team needs to have a clear understanding of its target market, its core competencies, the benefits it offers and its brand personality. [Adapted from: Your Business, October 2013]
